The Importance of Collaboration

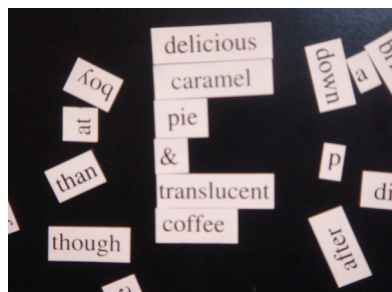

By Cory Clawson

Let's face it—sometimes two heads are better than one. I've become a big proponent of collaboration with our school librarians over the last few years, for a variety of reasons:

- If I'm teaching research skills, who is better to help teach the craft of finding and evaluating web-based information than librarians?
- They assist with navigating through our school databases, they know the tricks to Boolean searches, and they even offer carts of books for those occasions that require information outside of the web.
- They've introduced me to new means for my students to demonstrate their knowledge, such as Glogster and Photo Story.
- Even if I'm not specifically using the library, the librarians are amazing at brainstorming a new angle for a lesson, or a requirement on a rubric.

In short, my teaching is enriched every time I enter the library—my hat is off to the Northglenn High School Librarians!
